Abstract

Many people surrender to modern high pace way of life, placing their health and body second to cultural demands. This is pity, because with a daily routine of 30 min, one can contribute to his/her health, be more productive and eliminate daily stressors. By introducing the user with proper incentives (compete against others, accomplish achievements) to conduct fitness activity, together with the ability to see progress and socialize, ones quality of life may improve dramatically. Hence, potential and current users will find in fitness activity a joy-able necessity, a way of life, improving their life in varied ways.
